SANCTIONS AGAINST SOUTH AFRICAN COAL

On 16th September 1986 moves to impose a mandatory ban on all coal imports from South Africa into the EEC were blocked by the West German and Portuguese governments with the behind-the-scenes encouragement of Mrs Thatcher.

A year later South African coal continues to flood into Britain and the EEC. The Anti-Apartheid Movement (AAM) and the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) are working together to stop all imports of apartheid coal and are launching their campaigning initiatives with a joint Conference on Saturday 19th September on the theme "Sanctions Against South African Coal".

South African coal is tainted with the blood of black miners. They are employed in appalling conditions; forced to live in prison-like compounds; paid poverty wages, and work in the most dangerous conditions, as the Kinross disaster devastatingly illustrated. On average there are 600 deaths in the mines in South Africa annually.

Coal is a vital commodity for apartheid South Africa. The industry has expanded dramatically in the past decade providing much needed foreign exchange to fund the apartheid war-machine – R3.2 billion worth of exports in 1985 making it the second largest source of foreign exchange after gold. The South Africans have also deliberately sought to penetrate key markets such as the EEC, the USA and Japan in order to generate a dependency on cheap energy resources from South Africa.

But today in South Africa the Black miners are fighting back against racism and exploitation. The South African NUM is the giant of the rapidly expanding organised trade union movement. And the NUM in South Africa is appealing for sanctions and disinvestment as acts of solidarity with their struggle. At its last Congress the South African NUM resolved "to once again re-affirm its support for all forms of international pressures including sanctions and disinvestment".

Today it is calculated that 52% of all South African coal imports are destined for EEC countries – 22 million tonnes during 1986 alone. And in Britain, over the past decade, the problem has been growing. There has been a 3000% increase in direct South African coal imports which now stand at 313,000 tonnes per annum, according to official statistics; much more comes into Britain as blended coal from parts in Belgium and the Netherlands. Having broken into the British market during the miners strike, South Africa is now seeking to consolidate its position.

The time for action is now. The introduction of a coal ban in Britain and the EEC would strike a massive blow against the South African economy and give a boost to those such as the South African NUM who are the centre of the struggle.

The joint AAM and NUM one day conference "Sanctions against South African Coal" will provide a unique role in educating participants as to the realities of apartheid today; in exposing the role of the British government and big business in bolstering the apartheid system; and in mobilising action to stop all imports of apartheid coal.
